All of these can then be dragged to the track, raced, and if you're really lucky, smashed. And unlike other tracks (and the cars on them), Trailmakers tracks are real, and can be enjoyed even if you're not using them. The goal of Trailmakers is to complete each race without dying. While it's an odd goal, the game is forgiving in the respect that it will adjust your lap-time based on your past performances. It's probably the most rewarding racing sim out there, as it gives you complete control over your own lap times. Yes, there are times where you may get out of order, but unless you've got a death wish, you can just pick up the map, see where your lap time is, and get back to the track for another attempt. The game consists of a series of tracks. In reality, there are around 65 tracks in the game right now, with all of them in the *ahem* *ahem* experimental stage. Which makes them not so much playable as just a really fast game of test your map-building skills. But that's the appeal of the game, as it really takes the freedom of trackbuilding and lets you really put your own stamp on them. The good news is that all of these tracks are *ahem* *ahem* free, which means that you can even build your own tracks and try them out. There are also a ton of tracks out there already if you want to get stuck in with building tracks yourself. There are two ways to race Trailmakers, with each method offering a slightly different experience. In the free version, you can race the roads in any order you want, and it's quite possible to beat the game this way. However, if you pay $6.99 a month, you get access to a portion of the races in the Trailmakers Racing League (TML), which takes places in countries other than the US. The bonus content here is 100% worth paying the price for, as the races in TML are far more punishing than the standard versions. Trailmakers is free-to-play, with content in both the standard and TML versions. All of the content in the standard version are available in the TML version, however. If you're an import fan who wants to experience Trailmakers, as it's not available in 82157476af
